This chapter introduces the substantive obligations in investment treaties. Most offer a common core of six substantive protections to foreign investors. The chapter first considers the two ‘ relative ’ standards of protection—most-favoured nation treatment and national treatment. It then turns to four ‘ absolute ’ standards of protection: expropriation, fair and equitable treatment ...

Introduction: International law on foreign investment finds its origins in the international law on the treatment of aliens and has long been regarded as an instrument of Western dominance over and exploitation of developing countries. In the aftermath of decolonization, both substantive and procedural rules on the treatment of foreign investment were at the center of developing countries ' struggle to gain control over their natural resources and establish a New International Economic Order.
